Chapter 1. A Motherless Child

1. In an interview with Hans A. Fischer-Barnicol, Buber ironically attributed his stature as a celebrity to his beard. As the beard gained fullness, he bemusedly observed, people took him for a prophet. “Believe me,” he told his interlocutor, “I would shave this wonderful beard off, but then I would destroy my image. Hmm.” See Fischer-Barnicol, “Spiegelungen—Vermittlungen,” in Günther Neske, ed., Erinnerung zu Martin Heidegger (Pfullingen: Verlag Günther Neske, 1977), 89 f.

2. Reported to Aubrey Hodes, who “maintained a close relationship” to Buber during the last twelve years of his life. See Hodes, Martin Buber: An Intimate Portrait (New York: Viking, 1971), 43. For a slightly different articulation of this account, see Meetings, 22.

5. Buber to Franz Rosenzweig, August 2, 1922, in Letters, 269.
6. Martin Buber to Paula Winkler Buber, October 15, 1901, in Letters, 79. In an unpublished jotting, titled "For You," dated 1902, he tells Paula, "You came and gave me a soul. Therefore is not my soul merely this: your child." See Letters, 10 f.
7. Letter to the son of Ina Britschgi-Schimmer on the occasion of his bar mitzvah, cited in Ina Britschgi-Schimmer, "Der junge Martin Buber. Erinnerungen," Jüdischer Rundschau 33, no. 11 (February 2, 1920): 76. Expressing his condolence to a friend on the death of his mother, Buber wrote: "I participate in your mourning. I scarcely knew my mother, and this is perhaps why I know in a special way what it means to a person to lose one's mother." Buber to Lambert Schneider, July 23, 1955, in Letters, 591 f.
8. As noted in Hodes, An Intimate Portrait, 43. In his published autobiographical memoir, Buber explains a mismeeting as "the failure of a real meeting between men." The depth of the pain of a mismeeting was experienced for Buber when, in his thirties, his mother "had come from a distance to visit me, my wife, and children." It was the first time he had seen her since he was three years old, but "I could not gaze into her still astonishingly beautiful eyes without hearing from somewhere the word 'Vergegnung' as a word spoken to me." 21. Under the pressure of a deadline, Buber solicited Paula’s assistance to rework some of the tales included in his second collection of Hasidic lore, Die Legende des Baalschem (Frankfurt a.M.: Rütten & Loening, 1908). He would provide her with a literal translation of a saying by the Baal Shem Tov, which she then elaborated freely. See the correspondence between Martin and Paula from early December 1906, in Briefwechsel, 1: 249–252. The letters between Paula and Martin indicate that he would send her excerpts of a Hasidic text he had translated, which she would then not only elaborate but also stylize (Briefwechsel, 1: 250).

Buber also consulted his future son-in-law, Ludwig Strauss, a highly accomplished German poet. Cf. their correspondence of May 1922. Buber sent Strauss the manuscript of a forthcoming book on Hasidism to review. Strauss returned the manuscript with several dozen corrections of diction and syntax, all of which Buber accepted with gratitude. In 1888, he traveled to Constantinople with Helene Böhlau, where they both converted to Islam, whereupon they married and he took on his Arabic name. Helene would gain fame in her own right as an acclaimed novelist.

27. Buber's Israeli passport (No. 16890, issued in 1952) gives his height as 157 centimeters. At about the time he met Paula, he made the acquaintance of another woman, who in a memoir described him "as an utterly delicate, pale person with a high, broad forehead, dark, piercing inward eyes with feminine small, ethereal hands." Ina Britschgi-Schimmer, "Der junge Martin Buber. Erinnerungen," Jüdischer Rundschau 33, no. 11 (February 2, 1920): 75.

28. Cf. the couple's marriage certificate: "Bescheinigung der Eheschließung Martin Buber und Paula Winkler," Friedenau, April 20, 1907, Martin Buber Archive, file A:1d. Paula's religion is noted as "mosaisch," as is Martin's. Upon her conversion, Paula took on the Hebrew name Yehudit (Judith). The conversion was apparently performed by a liberal rabbi, for on March 26, 1934, she underwent an orthodox conversion in Berlin. See Chapter 8.

In 1943, for instance, he eagerly addressed in Polish the troops of the Polish Army in exile, stationed in Haifa, Palestine, on the occasion of the four hundredth anniversary of the death of the Polish mathematician and astronomer Nicolas Copernicus. In 1939 he gave a series of lectures in Poland on behalf of the Hebrew University. See Chapter 9.

14. For a German translation of the address, see Buber, “‘Glaube, Hoffnung, Liebe’ (Ewige Jugend),” in Martin Buber Werkausgabe, 1: 99–102. As indicated in a note he appended to the text, Buber wrote the address on November 15, 1892.

15. “Rede gehalten von Martin Buber an seiner ‘Barmizwah’-Feier am 8. Februar 1891,” in Martin Buber Werkausgabe, 1: 93–98. An article in the Hebrew journal Ha-Maggid (February 1891) reported that at a festive reception—“attended by the leaders and nobility” of the Jewish community—in his grandfather’s home, Martin apparently gave yet another bar mitzvah speech in which he concluded with a pledge “to observe all his life and with all his heart the precepts and ethical teachings of the Holy Torah.” This report is cited in an article, “Toward the History of Martin Buber,” BeTzaron (June 1965): 145 (Hebrew). Founded in 1840 as a “progressive” synagogue, the Lemberg “Temple,” as it was popularly called, had a choir and encouraged its rabbi to give sermons in German.

20. The late Ernst Simon, one of Buber’s closest friends, related to me that Buber defiantly claimed to have no knowledge of the Talmud. Yet, as reported by Buber’s research assistant in the early 1930s, on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday Abraham Joshua Heschel gave Buber as a gift a set of the Babylonian Talmud. With palpable gratitude, he told Heschel, “All my life I wanted the Talmud.” See Heit Yeshurun Raviv, “A Conversation with Dr. Moshe Spitzer,” Chadarim (Winter 1982–1983): 54 (Hebrew).

21. In his correspondence, he occasionally cites the Mishnah. In a letter to Paula of October 1902, for instance, he quotes Mishnah Hagigah 2:1, cautioning one not to probe the mysteries of existence. Briefwechsel, 1: 177.

56. Addressing the Third Zionist Congress (1899), Buber declared, “Zionismus ist keine Partei-Sache, sondern eine Weltanschauung” (Zionism is not a matter of party politics, but a worldview). A few days prior to the congress, a group of thirty-seven Jungzionisten, as they called themselves, met to organize as a “study circle” to strategize how to remedy what they regarded as the “neglect of cultural work within the Zionist movement. They convened at the initiative of Chaim Weizmann, who would forty-five years later serve as the first president of the State of Israel. At the congress they had no formal name, although as explained above they were ironically known as the Democratic Fraction. In a letter to Paula, written on the eve of the session of the Congress at which he delivered his address on “Jewish Art,” Buber reported that “a group of modernists has formed [namely, the Democratic Fraction], and I am one of their intellectual leaders—to phrase it modestly. The ancients (die Alten) are terribly scared of us, for the present more so than is justified. But today we achieved an important agenda victory, which was due chiefly to a very fiery speech by me. . . . Only this one thing more, dearest: This Congress is a turning point. We youngsters are beginning to take things under control.” Buber to Paula Winkler, December 26, 1901, in Letters, 81.

85. See, among other places, Buber to Herzl, July 24, 1902, in which Buber solicits a contribution to the forthcoming Jüdischer Almanach, the inaugural publication of the Jüdischer Verlag: “You cannot be absent from this first modern Zionist anthology” (Letters, 83). In his reply, dated August 10, 1902, Herzl tells Buber, “I need not tell you how glad I would be to send you a decent contribution” (Letters, 84).

86. While it had been Herzl’s wont to address his letters to Buber as “Dear Friend,” in response to a letter in which Buber announced that the Democratic Fraction was to organize a conference on Jewish culture in protest of how the Zionist Organization had handled the issue, Herzl would now simply open his letters to Buber with the salutation, “My dear Fellow Zionist.” See April 14, 1903, in Letters, 91.

93. In private, Herzl dismissed Buber’s conduct as puerile.

In a letter to Gershon Scholem, the scholar of Hasidism Joseph Weiss, then living in London, reported that he heard “from people in-the-know and the most veteran Zionists in Vienna, that when a dispute arose between the older Herzl and the young Buber, Herzl angrily said the Buber is not a surname, but rather a ‘Komperativ.’” The meaning of bub in German is “boy” or “youth,” hence “Buber signifies someone who is ‘more a boy,’ in other words ‘childish’ or ‘childlike.’” Weiss to Scholem, January 6, 1957, in Gershon Scholem–Joseph Weiss Correspondence, 1948–1964, ed. Noam Zadoff (Jerusalem: Carmel, 2013).

1. Buber’s record of studies at Nationalen Universitätsarchiv, Vienna, is cited in Margaret Olin, The Nation without Art: Examining the Modern Discourse on Jewish Art (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2001), 105.

2. The letter is cited in Hans Kohn, Martin Buber: Sein Werk und seine Zeit, eine Beitrag zur Geistesgeschichte Mitteleuropas, 1880–1930, 2nd ed. (Cologne: Joseph Melzer Verlag, 1961), 306. This envisioned volume was never realized.

Partially translated in Maurice Friedman, Martin Buber and the Theater (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1969), 10. The “threat of the infinite” so haunted Buber as a lad of fourteen that he contemplated suicide. Cf. Buber, Between Man and Man, trans. Maurice Friedman (New York: Macmillan, 1967), 136.

6. Buber to Hugo Bergmann, April 16, 1936, in Briefwechsel, 2: 589.

7. Riegel and Wickhoff served as the examiners of Buber’s initial and ill-fated doctoral oral in art history. Wickhoff and the classical archaeologist Emil Reisch administered the repeat exam. See Olin, Nation without Art, 104 f.

8. The priority he gave to completing Die Geschichten des Rabbi Nachman may have also been prompted by a desire to see the volume in print before his gravely ill grandfather passed away.

9. Cited in Kohn, Martin Buber, 309 f.

10. Buber to Franz Rosenzweig, May 28, 1925, in Briefwechsel, 2: 221. He specifically referred to his foreword to Die Geschichten des Rabbi Nachman (1906) and his preface to volume one of Die Gesellschaft (1906) as inaugurating his career as an author.

32. As Buber explained it, the concept of meeting (or encounter) arose “on the road of my thinking out of criticism of the concept of Erlebnis, to which I adhered in my youth, hence out of radical self-correction. ‘Erlebnis’ belongs to the exclusive, individualized psychic sphere. . . . The psychological reduction of being, its psychologizing, had a destructive effect on me in my youth because it removed from me the foundation of human reality, the ‘to-one-another.’ Only much later . . . did I win a reality that cannot be lost.” See Buber, “Replies to My Critics,” in The Philosophy of Martin Buber; part of the Library of Living Philosophers,

74. Hans Fischer-Barnicol first met Buber at a colloquium sponsored by the Evangelische Akademie, Berlin, in June 1956, and corresponded with him from then on. The interview was conducted in the summer of 1963. When asked years later by Emil Fackenheim about the controversy in Jerusalem engendered by Buber's reputedly reconciliatory meeting with Heidegger, Gershom Scholem questioned the authenticity of Barnicol-Fischer's "dreary report." He assured Fackenheim that neither he nor Buber's close friend Ernst Simon—"who privately sought fervidly to dissuade Buber from conducting such a discussion with Heidegger"—"knew anything that such a meeting actually took place."
